interior can be more cost effective than an addition, but when space is limited and there isn’t proper separation, an addition may be the best course of action. Secondly, make sure you have the space available to build-out in your municipality. Research all setback requirements including lot lines. Next, determine if a first floor addition can provide easy accessibility or if you will have to build up for a proper layout. The first floor suite is considered the best option and can also provide access to a private patio or garden for enriched natural surroundings. Also, to preserve privacy for both parties, consider building on the opposite side of the house from the master bedroom.

If all of these requirements are met, the next step is to find a professional contractor who has experience in designing for specific needs and functional design. Contractors with universal design certifications can help clients customize their homes with personal needs and future adaptability taken into consideration. Zero-threshold showers, wider doorways, and spa-like safety features are all examples of ideas to make in-law suites safe and increase the quality of life into the future.
