

After being placed in various situations throughout the years, I have emerged more self-aware and confident as a writer, artist, and right-brained thinker.

At the present, I can be described as the following—prone to sarcasm yet nice and friendly, hard-working with bouts of burnout, articulate in writing but not so much in speech—the paradoxical traits could go on and on.

As a first generation Asian American raised in a conservative, Christian household, I used to struggle with big questions concerning purpose, individuality, and existence.
