Overpopulation problems

Extinct animals is one major problem that will not slow down anytime soon, regardless of how many organizations that are try to prevent it from getting worse. Since the population is consistently growing the need for more food is rapidly increasing as well and with that need comes the need to find ways to get more food for everyone and that will most likely include killing-more animals to fill that need. Since most people enjoy meat and only a small amount of people are vegetarians the consumption of meat is very high and that affects animals heavily. With that in mind there are countless organizations that fight for the animals and try to protect them.

The World Wildlife Fund is a major company that actually works with the government to help secure funds from U.S. government partners to support their conservation programs and fieldwork around the world.

They also help educating people with scholarships, grants and awards to make a contribution to conservation of animals. WWF is doing their part in not just providing support for animals, but also educating people on what they can do to be apart of joining the fight and saving animals.
