

2

Be prepared for hard work and be patient.

Being the best comes at the price of dedicated hard work but if your single focus is to be a professional soccer player, this hard work is essential. Aiming for the professional level also requires patience - being able to accept that turning professional is a gradual process during which you continue to learn, to build your technical skills, soccer knowledge, and importantly, making good contacts. people (networking). As a player wanting to become the best, you will need to dedicate time.

3

Know soccer inside out.

From the start to the end, learn as much about the game as you can. This means learning from books, watching matches, training, watching DVDs, participating in matches, and talking to good soccer players about their tactics and the things that they have found most or least successful as they have climbed the ranks. Have a solid understanding of what famous soccer players have done to succeed, including their signature moves. Pay attention to the diagonal runs behind the defense. A center forward making an angled run just behind another defender, say a 10 yard sprint, at just the right moment, could be getting ready to receive the ball.

4

Commit to playing football through graduated levels.

Choose a school team, local club, or district team that you can attend regularly and that has a good coach. Each country, state, or region will have its own club or team expectations and progression levels, so it is not possible to be precise process itself.

Be exceptional.

After you've had a chance to play for a while, it's time to start seriously looking at your skills. Find out what position your innate skills are best suited to. When working this out, don't just think about yourself but also think about how your skills feed into your teamwork, and how your strengths fit into the game as a whole. Ultimately, it is important that you are really good at what you do because there is a lot of competition and there isn't any room for second best. Seek your coach's honest opinion your strengths.

5

6

Be in great shape.

Your fitness levels matter in football. Work on your fitness by exercising regularly, eating healthily, and avoiding substances that can impair your performance, such as alcohol. Get enough sleep every night. It is also important to learn how to try and stay injury-free - this includes learning how to play well from the start (i.e., knowing how to kick properly, etc.), and how to keep in good physical shape generally through stretching, exercising, etc., so that you don't suffer from avoidable injuries. Football is a team sport and good communications are vital. able to get along well with your fellow team members.