PEOPLE IN THE NEWS

Dior stokes outrage with new Sauvage fragrance ad

The Associated Press

FLAGSTAFF, Ariz. — Dior has produced a fragrance called Sauvage since the mid-1960s and used Johnny Depp in recent years to promote it. But a new advertising campaign that paired them with Native American imagery deepened wounds among a population whose ancestors were called savages and systematically killed.

The French luxury goods company posted a trailer Friday with a Lakota dancer in colorful clothing that it said embodied modern Native American culture and promised more details on the fragrance Monday. The videos were removed from Dior's Instagram and Twitter accounts hours later, although they still appeared on some unrelated accounts devoted to Depp.

The trailer and videos continued to generate heavy criticism. Sauvage in French has a variety of meanings, including wild, unspoiled and savage. "That takes it to a whole other level of ignorance and racism," said Dallas Goldtooth of the Lower Sioux Indian Community in Minnesota.

Dior worked with Americans for Indian Opportunity, a respected but sometimes controversial consulting firm based in Albuquerque, New Mexico, on the campaign. It's the same group that ceremoniously adopted Depp as an honorary member of the Comanche Nation while he was filming the 2013 adaptation of

"The Lone Ranger."

Executive director Laura Harris said she expected the backlash but wanted to ensure Native Americans were part of the production, that it would educate people on indigenous values and philosophy, and that the Native components of the shoot were done tastefully and respectfully.

Harris said Dior will not change the name of the fragrance or cancel a commercial shot in southern Utah called "We Are the Land" starring Depp. Marketing materials describe it as an "ode to Mother Earth" and say the inclusion of the dancer is meant to be a "powerful tribute to this culture, portrayed with immense respect."

Local woman reconnects with loved ones through better hearing

From confusion and frustration to social isolation, the numerous ways that living with hearing loss can affect your personal life cannot be understated.

For Lois Sills, miscommunication was a very common occurrence. Before she was fitted with a pair of top-of-the-line Audibel hearing aids, Lois often found herself unable to comprehend what was being said to her — sometimes to comical effect.

"I was mishearing a lot of things, especially when speaking with my grandchildren," she shared. "For example, they once told me about something going on at school, which I misinterpreted as 'grapefruit.' And they'd go, 'What grandma?'"

"It was so far out of left field, I couldn't even imagine how I'd made that kind of connection. My misinterpretations also created a lot of needless arguments with my husband."

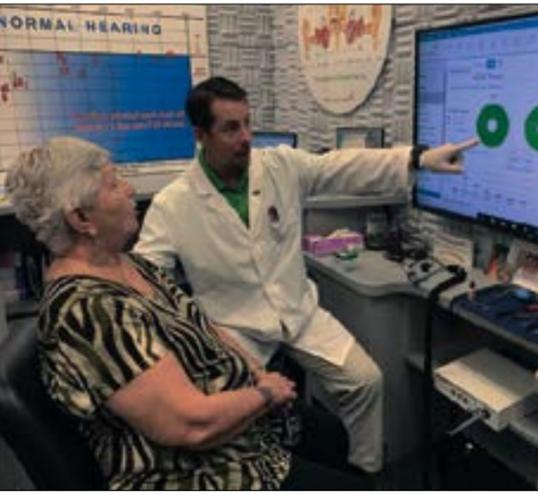

Despite years of her family insisting she get fitted for hearing aids, Lois was still apprehensive about the whole concept. She, of course, knew she needed to address her hearing issues, but as a retiree on a fixed income, she was concerned about finances. "I was very nervous about the whole thing," she recalled.

When Lois scheduled an appointment at her nearest Audibel location, her concerns were immediately put to rest when the company's easy payment plan was explained to her. During Lois's initial consultation and examination, a friendly Audibel hearing aid specialist conducted an audiometric test of her ears, clearly explaining the results with a detailed audiogram. She was then fitted with a pair of state-of-the-art rechargeable hearing aids, wearing them during a convenient 45-day trial period with weekly appointments so she could familiarize herself with the devices.

According to Lois, the experience has transformed her life for the better.

"My grandkids, husband and friends no longer have to repeat things over and over again — I feel connected," she said. "And I can finally understand the music I like again. I listen to heavy metal and

When I returned with a sense of purpose to the West, I found a place that was not just a geographical location, but a way of life. The West was a place of opportunity and growth, a place where you could make your own destiny.

This possibility inspired me to go west. I had heard that the West was a place of opportunity and growth, a place where you could make your own destiny. I had heard that the West was a place of opportunity and growth, a place where you could make your own destiny.

It is true that the West was a place of opportunity and growth, a place where you could make your own destiny. I had heard that the West was a place of opportunity and growth, a place where you could make your own destiny.

West therefore shifted to the West. I had heard that the West was a place of opportunity and growth, a place where you could make your own destiny.
